

PHONE-FIRST WORKFLOW

Mobile Writing Worksheet

Turn one intimidating creative project into small sessions that fit inside a phone screen and an imperfect day.

How to use this

Choose one small outcome per session. Stop with a clear next action so returning does not require rebuilding the entire project in your head.

Best used when: you create mainly on a phone, work in bursts, or freeze when a task feels too large.

1. Today's tiny target

A useful session has one finish line.

What am I working on?

Name one project and one section only.

What will exist when I stop?

Example: five cast hooks, one opening draft, or three memory cards.

How much energy do I have?

Low, medium, or locked in. Adjust the target honestly.

2. Make the task phone-sized

Break it until each action can fit on one screen.

First five-minute action

Something you can begin without research.

Next small action

Build directly on the first result.

Optional extra action

Only if energy remains.

What am I deliberately not doing today?

Protect the session from scope creep.

3. Capture without organizing everything

Messy notes are allowed. Losing them is less charming.

Raw ideas

Fragments, lines, questions, images, or contradictions.

Facts that became canon

Only record decisions you intend to keep.

Questions for later

Do not interrupt the current task unless the answer blocks it.

4. Paste-ready output

End with something that can move into FictionLab, a workbook, or your project file.

Finished text from this session

Where does it belong?

Name the exact page, card, field, or document section.

Does it need editing before use?

Keep exactly, grammar only, polish in my voice, or rewrite freely.

5. Leave a trail back

Future-you deserves directions.

What did I finish?

What is the very next action?

Make it small and concrete.

What am I waiting on?

A decision, reference, test result, or nothing.

One sentence to restart with

Quick low-energy menu

- Rename and sort five notes.
- Write one character want and one fear.
- Turn one paragraph into a memory card.
- Test one opening response.
- Write three content labels.
- Choose one image crop.
- Record the next action and stop without guilt.
